To assess the immunogenicity of different vaccine constructs, mice were immunized intramuscularly with DNA vaccines encoding a mouse listeriolysin O (LLO) construct, a set of truncated LLO constructs, or a DNA vaccine encoding a mammalian alkaline phosphatase (AP). Vaccinations were done either with a single DNA dose or with 2 doses of each vaccine by DNA immunization or intramuscular inoculation. Mice immunized with DNA encoding full-length LLO and truncated LLO constructs had markedly high antibody titers and were significantly protected against a challenge with Listeria monocytogenes. A modest increase in immunogenicity was seen when the LLO DNA was administered at a second dose. Mice immunized with DNA encoding the full-length LLO or LLO truncations were also significantly protected against a
